Analysis

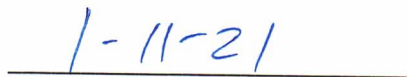

In the pursuits listed above, it is important to note that no injuries were reported to any party as a result of the pursuit. Vehicle pursuits can be dangerous, not to just the officer and suspect, but also people on or around the roadways of which they travel on. While any pursuit can cause a risk to others, that risk can be raised even higher by the actions of the fleeing subject. Our officers and supervisors alike have received training on the policy regarding vehicle pursuits. They are further tasked with weighing the dangers of the pursuit to offense itself, and then making a determination if one outweighs the other. In each of the 3 pursuits this year, the supervisor, and/or officer was found by the command staff to have used proper judgment, which is further shown by the lack of physical harm to any person as a result of the pursuit. In 1 of the pursuits, the pursuit was reviewed with the pursuing Officer to show areas of which they could improve on. These included not relaying info to supervisor regarding reason for stop and failing to advise on current speeds. No further corrective action was taken.

No policy or procedure changes are being recommended to the command staff at this time. Each future pursuit should continue to be evaluated by the command staff on a case-by-case basis, and any deficiency noted addressed at that time.

I, Sgt. Brian Massey, preparer of this report, state that to the best of my findings the information above is a true and accurate account of the information available for this report.
